II. Requirements:

A. You will be responsible for preparing texts assigned for discussion, and it is imperative that you do so. You will also be responsible for the recommended readings marked with an asterisk. The graduate students should do all of the recommended readings.

B. The written requirements for the course.

1. There will be two possible arrangements for meeting the written requirement of the course, the first for undergraduates and the second for graduate students.
   a. Several shorter papers:
      1) A 5-8 page paper on sections II to IV—due on Monday, Oct. 17.
      3) A 5-8 page paper on sections IX and X—due on Dec. 1.
   b. Papers on each of the Origin sections and one longer paper at the end of term.
      1) Thus, a series of two page papers on each of the sections of Darwin’s Origin of Species—due on Oct. 24, Oct. 31, Nov. 7, Nov. 14.
      2) One longer paper (about 20 pages or so)—due on Dec. 1.

2. Character of the papers
   a. The 5-8 page papers can be on any topic found in the relevant sections. It should be some problem or concept that you isolate, explain, and provide a resolution for. These should deal with the primary literature (texts for discussion), though may be generated by something in the secondary literature (recommended reading).
   b. In the two-page papers, you should select one of the chapters of the Origin found in that section and then:
      1) Indicate the argument or arguments Darwin is making.
      2) Indicate the logical features of the argument and the evidence for the conclusion.
      3) Mention the kinds of rhetorical devices he uses.
      4) Evaluate the persuasiveness of the argument found in the text.
   c. The longer paper can be on any topic derived from the course. It should focus on the primary material for the course, but the argument carried on can and should also deal with the secondary material.

d. The 5-8 page papers and the longer paper should be in hard copy, typed, stapled, and handed in on the date due. Turn them into the secretary in the Fishbein Center (Social Sciences 205). You must also retain a copy of your paper.
e. The two-page papers should be sent to the Chalk site (in the drop box). The should be sent by noon of the Monday prior to class.
f. All of your papers must have your name on the paper and whether you are a grad student or undergrad.
